Supply chain management (SCM) involves the concept that almost all products that reach an end user represents the cumulative effort of multiple organizations. Each interface in the supply chain represents movement of goods and information flows and the purchase and sale of raw materials and components to the manufacturer, retailer and ultimately the consumer. Supply chains involve business processes within your company of product development, sourcing, production, logistics and the information systems needed to coordinate these activities, all of which will maximize customer value and create a competitive advantage.
